Why is Psychology Today refusing to publish articles related to sexual addiction, pornography addiction and other out-of-control sexual behaviors?

Ardmore, PA (October 26, 2016) The Society for the Advancement of Sexual Health (SASH) and the International Institute on Trauma and Addiction Professionals (IITAP) have just sent a petition with some 735 signatures and additional letters and other supporting items to the officers and editors of Psychology Today. The petition requests them to reconsider their editorial stance against discussing and naming issues directly related to sexual addiction, pornography addiction, sexual compulsivity, hypersexual disorder and out-of-control sexual behavior. The supporting materials and the first supporting letter contain an excellent summary of the extensive research that supports the existence of these disorders as well as diagnostic codes that can already be used for reimbursable diagnosis.

We believe that the field of study and our members as individual treatment providers are experiencing a form of persistent editorial discrimination both in Psychology Today magazine's feature articles and restrictions on bloggers. Such discrimination serves neither our profession as a whole nor those troubled individuals whom we all seek to help.

Our work does not discriminate against anyone due to sexual orientation, gender identity, offending or individual patterns of sexual arousal, even if those concerns conflict with a client's ideal self-image (ego- dystonic). It is not in our interest, nor in our clients' interests, for us to bring our own cultural, religious or ethical biases to our clinical work.

Society for the Advancement of Sexual Health, P.O. Box 566, Ardmore, PA 19003

The petition acknowledges that attempted discussions with individual editors and multiple “letters to the editor” have met with a wall of silence.

Psychology Today is a for-profit business. We want its officers and editors to be aware of our size and influence. SASH and IITAP, collectively with around 2,150 members, are the largest organized providers of treatment and education about problematic sexual behavior in the United States.

The Society for the Advancement of Sexual Health (SASH) is a nonprofit multidisciplinary organization founded in 1987, dedicated to scholarship, clinical training, and resources for promoting sexual health and overcoming problematic sexual behaviors such as sex/porn addiction, hypersexual disorder, out of control sexual behavior, sexual impulsivity, and sexual abuse. Visit www.sash.net for more.

You can read the petition, supporting materials and letters here. The supporting material and the first supporting letter contain what is in effect a crash course or master class in understanding the latest research into sexual addictions.
